Unlike straightforward web browsers, Opera Mini fetches all content through a proxy server, renders it using the Presto layout engine,[15] and reformats web pages into a format more suitable for small screens.[47] A page is compressed, then delivered to the phone in a markup language called Opera Binary Markup Language (OBML), which Opera Mini can interpret.[48] According to Opera Software, the data compression makes transfer time about two to three times faster,[30] and the pre-processing improves the display of web pages not designed for small screens.[49] The turbo mode was added later and is similar to Mini mode but bypasses compression for interactive functionality, at the expense of less extreme data compression. In this mode, the page is reformatted into a single vertical column so that it need only be scrolled vertically.[30] Long lists and navigation bars are automatically collapsed (hiding most of the list or bar) by a feature known as "content folding". It included new features such as the ability to download files, new custom skins, more search engine options on the built-in search bar, a speed dial option, new search engines, and improved navigation.[25] On 1 November 2006, Opera Mini 3 beta introduced secure browsing, RSS feeds, photo uploading and content folding into its list of features and capabilities.[26] Content folding works by folding long lists such as navigation bars into a single line that can be expanded as needed. 16 June 2016.
